

DRESSING THEM IN BLUE.

The Conductors of the Third Avenue Street Cars Required to Buy Uniforms.

A wall of lamentation stretches along Third avenue from the Harlem River to Chatham square, and each horse car has its load of misery. The conductors have all been ordered to provide themselves with uniforms before the 15th of July, and the majority say they do not want uniforms, especially when they have to pay for them themselves.

"It's bad enough to be a conductor," one of the employees said yesterday, "without being forced into advertising the fact with brass buttons and a blue uniform. A few days ago we were all ordered to put up $8 toward paying for them, and the men who have been attacked by worms, and the worse was, stung at home for June, 10, 1885, for July, 1885, for August, 1, 1886; for December, 10, for January, 1, for February, 10, for March, 10, 1886. Bills were drawn on us for March 10, 1886. Receipts from the 300 bills.

The Superintendent of the road said the conductors were ordered to procure uniforms, and were only to pay $8 toward the purchase price, the same amount coming up to the scratch. The company made nothing out of the transaction, but had simply selected the goods and a firm to make up the bill. And he provided with a set of black buttons and a set of brass buttons. On duty the brass buttons would be worn, and off duty the black buttons.
